This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

THE publication of a translation to accompany a Latin text in a school edition of a work, and that by an experienced schoolmaster who is anxious to contribute his mite to the improvement of classical education, is a proceeding so unusual as to seem to call for a few words of prefatory explanation. Are not boys prone to seek "clandestine refuges"? And is not the surreptitious use of translations an evil that schoolmasters have reason to deplore? It cannot be denied that the evil is great; for a boy's character is sure to be injured by the practice of deception and the almost certain relaxation of industry and loss of self-confidence, while taste and scholarship are likely to suffer hardly less.

Yet I am convinced that there comes a time in a boy's education when translations of the classics may be used, under proper conditions, not only without harm, but with great advantage. There comes a time, and in reading such an author as Vergil it comes early, when instruction should cease to be directed to forms and syntax, should cease to be grammatical and philological and should become literary; when a classical work should be studied in a way to be appreciated, enjoyed, and judged as a piece of literature. To what degree this can be carried out, depends, in part, to be sure, upon the age and previous training of learners, and in part upon other circumstances; but it is at least possible to lay great emphasis upon translation, and a detailed and critical study of translation is the best possible way to foster a literary sense and cultivate literary judgment.

It is true that the way to learn to do a thing is to do it, and not merely to see it done. Hence boys and girls must practice translation a great deal. But they can also learn much from the study of good models; and I think teachers hardly have a right to complain of the eternal baldness of the translations of their pupils, so long as they deny them access to the best models, and do not daily show them by their own performance to what they would have them aspire in form and diction. I have come to believe that both means are necessary — frequent translations by the teacher, especially to embody and enforce criticisms of daily lessons, and a certain amount of detailed study of the best printed translations. Of the latter, the study of a single book of the Aeneid, for example, or of the Iliad or Odyssey, or of a single oration of Cicero, may be enough. A learner should have a clear notion of what a good translation is and of the principles on which it should be worked out. If to this be added the inspiration of the teacher's example, I know not what more can be done.

What I am here recommending to teachers, it has long been my own custom to practice. I am in the habit of taking the last few minutes of the lesson-hour to translate to my class, as well as I am able, the page or two of Vergil, or whatever other author has occupied us; not permitting myself to interject explanations, but reading, as I would have them do, without break to the end. This I have done for reasons that have already been indicated — as a means of repeating and summing up points touching the meaning and mode of rendering, and also as the best way to throw into darker relief faults of translation that are most incorrigible and deplorable, if haply I may make some a little unhappy over their own too literal, bald, and anti-poetical versions.

In this practise I have found the seventh book of the Aeneid much the most difficult of the whole poem, and that first suggested to me the desirableness of writing out a translation for my own use; further reflection led me to think that by publishing it I might do a service to students and teachers of Vergil.

It will not require many words to explain the principles on which this translation has been made. It was not at all my aim to make what is generally understood by a "literal" translation, i. e. a translation in which the syntactical structure of the original is, so far as possible, scrupulously and rigorously reflected. Whatever raison d'être such translations may have, the use of them by boys and girls is sure to foster laziness and weaken self-reliance. Still less had I any purpose of making what is called a "free" translation, interpolating or suppressing, expanding or retrenching, at my own pleasure or convenience. I have sought everywhere and always to express the exact meaning of the original as rigorously as would be done in the most literal version, without addition for the sake of ornament, or omission or obscurity for the sake of evading a difficulty. But I have tried to do this without offence to the purity of English idiom.

In the next place I have made it a constant study to keep as close to the Latin order as possible, still under the imperative condition that in no case should English order be strained or transgressed; and I have sometimes been surprised to see how far the order of the original could be imitated in a translation. I have tried to impart to my version a slight poetical flavor, but without the use of distinctively poetic words, except in very rare instances; I remember only the poetic contractions o'er, ope, and ere, each used but once or twice. At least I hoped it might be apparent to any one not acquainted with the original that it was not a translation of prose, but of poetry.

Finally I have essayed the much harder task, following the example of Professer Palmer, of translating into rhythmical prose. This, however, I have found it impossible to do always, consistently with fidelity to principles which I have already stated and which I deemed of paramount importance. The splendid achievement of Professor Palmer in his translation of the Odyssey could, alas! do no more for me than prompt me to try to imitate him; it could not give wings to leaden feet. If Professor Palmer would translate the Aeneid as he has translated the Odyssey, he would not indeed afford delight to a greater number, for the Aeneid bears no comparison to the Odyssey in interest, and is probably read by fewer non-classical scholars, but he would do an even greater service to classical education and powerfully promote in schools the use of English pure and unalloyed.

I have said that I found this seventh book the most difficult one of the whole Aeneid. I do not mean difficult to understand, with the exception of here and there a passage, but difficult to render into idiomatic and harmonious English. To others, who, in addition to competent knowledge and poetic feeling, have a ready and masterful command of English, it may not seem a hard thing to do; but probably the majority of schoolmasters are not so richly endowed, and to them I am not ashamed to confess that this translation has cost me a good deal of time and labor. It is unpardonable in any one who makes a text-book, not to do his best. It is sometimes difficult enough to pardon one who does his best. I have not been satisfied with aiming merely at my own best. Any one who should at this late day put forth a translation of Vergil and ask favor for it on the ground that it was distinctively original, would show more vanity than wisdom. The worst translation of the Iliad that I am acquainted with is the most original. In such a piece of work one has no right to ignore what has already been done. A new translation is an impertinence if it merely adds one to the number already existing, or merely exhibits, with whatever ingenuity and skill, personal notions or idiosyncrasies. Therefore, after making my own version, I felt bound to correct and improve it as far as possible by a diligent comparison with other versions. For this purpose I selected the translations of Dryden, Davidson, Wheeler, Lonsdale and Lee, and Conington. Partly with the aid of my daughter Sibyl, and partly by myself, a minute comparison was made of my version with each of these. From Dryden I borrowed perhaps only four or five words, and from Davidson probably not more. Wheeler suggested a few more changes, Lonsdale and Lee many more; but from none of these do I remember appropriating an entire sentence. But whoever makes a detailed comparison of my version with Conington's prose translation, will see that my obligations to him are by no means small. Of course a great many verbal coincidences are accidental. I would gladly have acknowledged all explicit appropriations and adaptations, but such a course, besides being impracticable, would convey an erroneous, because inadequate, impression. How can one indicate the many subtle suggestions that spring from a minute and prolonged comparison and balancing of one's own forms of expression with the text of the original and with another's renderings?

On the other hand I ought not to exaggerate my indebtedness to Conington. His prose translation of the seventh book of the Aeneid ends with line 640, thus covering only a little more than three fourths of the book. I am not able to see that my translation of this omitted fourth falls below the other parts in which I had the aid of Conington.

I now commit my completed task to the searching criticism and judgment of my fellow-teachers. If it does not prove useful in the way I intended, it may prove not without helpful suggestiveness.

So. YARMOUTH, August 15, 1892.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

THE object of this translation is not to lessen the labor of the learner, but rather to stimulate him to more strenuous effort and to make his labor more fruitful. It is designed particularly to facilitate progress in translating and to serve as a model in subsequent study. It is recommended that the book be read through twice. The student should first carefully compare the translation with the text and everywhere make out the literal meaning. Next he should study, with the aid of the Latin equivalents given at the bottom of the page, the Vocabulary, and the Word-groups, a number of the less familiar words, which may be indicated beforehand by the teacher. This study should of course not be limited to words whose equivalents in Latin are given, and should include comparisons of different meanings of the words studied in previous passages. This can be easily done, as full references are given in the Vocabulary. The enlargement of the student's working vocabulary, for which the helps are ample, should thus be made a distinct aim.

How should the lesson-hour or recitation-period be spent? Partly, as is implied above, in examining the pupils on the work assigned in reference to the literal sense of passages here and there, where the translation given does not indicate the construction of the original, and also in reference to the study of words; partly in a criticism of the translation; that is, in such inquiries as, "Why was this form of expression chosen?" "Why this order?" "Why was the construction of the Latin not followed here?" "How would the rhythmical character of this sentence be affected by the substitution of this or that word?" "How is the force of this Latin suffix conveyed?" "Does the Latin contain all that is expressed in the translation?" "Is anything in the Latin lost in the translation?" Such an examination will surely sharpen the insight and appreciation, improve the taste, and beget a wholesome dislike of crude and slovenly versions.

Drill in syntax should be allowed to sleep for a time and many points be permitted to pass unnoticed that might easily invite discussion. A class should be able to take double the ordinary lesson, and when the book has been completed in this way, it should be rapidly reviewed without the accompanying translation, and the only work required should be the metrical reading of the text and an independent version by the student. Independent, but not too insistently independent, since not a little of the translation studied will remain in the memory. It is not of course to be expected or required of the pupil that he shall translate into rhythmical prose; but it is to be hoped that much reading aloud of the translation supplied will cultivate the ear and insensibly give a feeling for cadence that will affect the choice of words and forms of expression.

STORY OF BOOKS I.–VII.

I. — The Aeneid opens with the events of the seventh summer after the fall of Troy. Aeneas, who, as the chosen instrument of the Fates, is to found a mighty nation in Italy, is still seeking his future home, and has just departed with his fleet from the shores of Sicily. The successful termination of his voyage seems almost assured, when Juno, who has pursued him through his seven years' wanderings with relentless hostility, and who is now roused to a fever of jealous hatred at the prospect of his final triumph, again appears, determined to thwart his plans and blast his hopes. By flattering promises she prevails upon Aeolus, king of the winds, to raise a tempest for the destruction of the Trojan fleet. The tempest is at its height and the Trojans are in imminent peril, when Neptune interposes to rebuke the winds and calm the troubled waters. At length, spent with toil, Aeneas and his followers find refuge in a sheltered harbor and effect a landing.

The shore which the Trojans have reached is the coast of Africa, where Queen Dido, driven from Tyre by the monstrous crimes of her brother, is founding the city of Carthage. At the intercession of Venus, the mother of Aeneas, Jupiter implants in the heart of Dido a kindly feeling towards the strangers who have arrived on her coast, and thus prepares the way for their hospitable reception. On the following day, the queen graciously receives Aeneas in the presence of her nobles, and soon is inspired with passionate love for him through the secret machinations of Venus. At a banquet celebrated in his honor, she invites him to tell the story of the siege of Troy and of his seven years' wanderings.

II. — To an audience hushed in breathless silence Aeneas tells his story. At the close of the ten years' siege of Troy, the Greeks, under pretence of propitiating Pallas by a votive offering, built a huge wooden horse and filled it with warriors. Beguiled by the cunning lies of a pretended deserter from the Greek force, the Trojans dragged this horse into their city. Under cover of the night, the armed men descended from the horse, the gates of the city were opened, and the whole army of the Greeks rushed in. The citizens, now buried in sleep and incapable of resistance, were ruthlessly butchered; Priam's palace was stormed and sacked, and Priam himself slain; and Aeneas, after vainly endeavoring with a devoted band of followers to stem the tide of murderous slaughter, took refuge, with his father Anchises, his son Iulus, and a crowd of fugitives, on the neighboring hills. Here, under comforting assurances from the gods of a brighter future, they made preparations for a voyage to the distant and unknown western land, Hesperia, where the Fates had decreed that their descendants should become a mighty nation.

III. — At the opening of the following summer, the Trojans, having now built and equipped their fleet, embarked for their long voyage. Having no definite knowledge of the situation of the land to which they were to direct their course, they first sailed to the coast of Thrace, but were there warned to depart by a voice from the grave of the murdered Polydorus. So they consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delos; but, misinterpreting the response, they next proceeded to Crete, whence they were soon driven by the outbreak of a pestilence. They were on the point of sending messengers to Delos to find out how they had offended the gods, when the Penates appeared to Aeneas in a vision with the tidings that Italy, not Crete, was their destined home. Accordingly they next set sail for Italy, but were driven on the shores of the Strophades. Here the malignant Celaeno, queen of the Harpies, filled them with dismay by the prediction that, before they should succeed in founding the city promised by the Fates, they would be compelled by hunger to gnaw their very tables. Their next landing-place was Buthrotum, on the coast of Epirus. Here Helenus, the seer, told them that the shore on which they should find a white sow, with a litter of thirty young, lying in the shade of the trees, would be the limit of their wanderings and the site of their permanent abode. Avoiding Scylla and Charybdis, as they continued their voyage, and escaping the giant Cyclopes, they finally reached the harbor of Drepanum on the western coast of Sicily. "I had just departed from Sicily," says Aeneas in conclusion, "when Heaven drove me on your shores."

IV. — As Aeneas tells his story, Dido's admiration and love for the hero of such perilous adventures mount higher. She makes a confidante of her sister Anna, who fans the flame by warm expressions of approval and sympathy. Juno, too, seeing in a union between Aeneas and Dido a possible means of overreaching Destiny and securing for Carthage the gift of universal sway that has been awarded by the Fates to Rome, joins with Venus in a plot for promoting such a union. This purpose they accomplish, and the royal pair are united.

Forthwith the mischievous consequences are seen in the infatuation of the royal lovers. Aeneas forgets in Dido's society the high destiny that awaits him, and Dido no longer finds pleasure in watching over her newly established government. In the midst of this idle dalliance, Mercury, despatched by Jupiter, rudely awakens Aeneas from his dreamy self-indulgence and rouses him to action. Aeneas, restored to a sense of responsibility for the future of his race, gives orders to his men to prepare the fleet for sailing. Tearful messages from the queen and stormy interviews follow; but neither entreaties nor reproaches can move the Trojan leader from his purpose. At last the fleet sets sail, and Dido, overcome by grief and shame, falls on her sword and expires on the funeral pile which she has erected.

V. — Hardly is the fleet of Aeneas out of sight of land, when a storm arises, which drives the ships on the coast of Sicily. It is the anniversary of Anchises' death, and by providential guidance, as it would seem, the Trojans have on this date reached the spot which will forever be hallowed as the final resting-place of their revered counsellor. What can be more fitting than that they should make sacrifices and celebrate funeral games in his honor? Accordingly, after appropriate sacrifices, Aeneas institutes a series of contests. The first is a spirited boat-race, in which Cloanthus is the winner; the second is a foot-race, in which Euryalus, through the questionable generosity of his friend Nisus, gains the first prize; the third is a boxing-match, in which the braggart champion Dares is severely punished by the sturdy old Entellus; the fourth is a contest in archery, in which the shaft of the aged Acestes bursts into flame in mid-air. Finally, the youth, under the leadership of Iulus, execute certain equestrian movements known as the "game of Troy."

At this point, the joy of the spectators is turned into dismay by a calamity that had well-nigh proved fatal. Through the instigation of Juno, the Trojan women, who have been left by themselves on the seashore during the progress of the games, seized with an uncontrollable longing for release from further wanderings, set fire to the ships of the fleet. Four ships are thus destroyed, so that it becomes necessary for Aeneas to leave behind a part of his followers in Sicily. At night the spirit of Anchises appears to him in a vision and bids him undertake a journey to the lower world on his arrival at Cumae, that father and son may confer together there, and that Aeneas may learn what Fate has in store for him and his descendants. The remaining ships, with the hardier spirits on board, at length set sail once more for Italy.

VI. — On reaching the shores of Cumae, Aeneas makes his way to the temple of Apollo to consult the sibyl Deiphobe. In response to his appeal for aid, she gives him directions for finding the golden bough which is to be his passport in the under world, and, when he has found it, accompanies him on his journey thither. Having offered due sacrifices to the gods of the lower world, they enter together the mouth of the cavernous passage which leads to the realms of Pluto. Passing on their way the shadowy forms of many monsters of appalling aspect, they reach at length the river Styx, and are ferried over its waters by the grisly Charon. Beyond the Styx they find three distinct areas or enclosures: a neutral region including the Fields of Mourning, Tartarus the place of torment, and Elysium the abode of the blest. In Elysium Anchises dwells. Here the sight of the river Lethe and of the vast multitude of spirits that are thronging to drink of its waters leads Anchises to unfold to Aeneas the mysteries of expiation and the transmigration of souls. They go on and ascend an eminence overlooking the moving host, and here Anchises points out to Aeneas his future descendants, as they pass in review, and acquaints him with their destiny. The long line of distinguished Romans includes Augustus Caesar, and closes with the young Marcellus, whose early promise and recent death were fresh in the memories of Vergil's contemporaries. At length, by the ivory gate of exit, Aeneas returns to the upper world and rejoins his companions.

VII. — Skirting the shores of Italy, the fleet of Aeneas at length reaches the mouth of the Tiber. The Trojans land, gather some native fruits, which they heap up on broad wheaten cakes, and refresh themselves with this food under the hospitable shade of a lofty tree. After eating the fruits, they are about to break and eat the wheaten cakes also, when Iulus exclaims: "Why, we are eating our tables!" This is at once recognized as the harmless fulfillment of the dread prophecy of Celaeno; and for the first time the weary Trojans rejoice in the assurance that their wanderings are at an end. They have reached the promised Hesperia.

At the time of Aeneas's arrival, Latinus is king in Latium. His daughter Lavinia is betrothed to Turnus, king of the Rutuli, a suitor favored by the queen Amata. But Latinus has a misgiving, for the oracle of Faunus, his prophetic sire, has declared that Lavinia is to wed a foreigner and become the mother of a posterity that shall rule the world. Accordingly, when Aeneas sends an embassy with overtures of friendship, Latinus graciously receives the envoys and cordially accepts the proffered alliance.

At this point, Juno again interposes to wreck the fortunes of the hated Trojans. She sends Alecto, one of the Furies, who incites Amata to stir up the matrons of Latium, and afterwards goads Turnus to vengeance. Iulus, too, while hunting, kills a favorite stag, and thereby rouses Tyrrhus, keeper of the royal herds, to fury. At instigation of Tyrrhus, the peasantry take up arms. A conflict is precipitated in which two shepherds are slain by the Trojans. The whole country is instantly in arms, and Latinus is urged on every hand to declare war against the strangers. Remonstrance is unavailing, and the aged king shuts himself up in his palace and lays down the reins of government.

The book closes with a long account of the mustering of the Italian tribes for war against the Trojans.

THE AENEID, VII.

THOU too, Caieta, nurse of Aeneas, didst by thy death give to our shores undying fame. Even now thy glory broods o'er thy resting-place, and thy name marks where thy ashes lie in great Hesperia, whatever glory that may be. But pious Aeneas, having duly paid the last rites and heaped up a funeral mound, when the swelling seas had grown calm, spreads sail for his voyage and leaves the port. The breezes freshen as the night comes on, nor does the silver moon refuse her guidance. The sea gleams under her rippling light. First they skirt the shores of Circe's land, where the rich daughter of the Sun makes her groves resound with constant song, her groves perilous to approach, and in her proud palace burns fragrant cedar for torch by night, while she runs through her fine warp with shrill-sounding comb. From here come to their ears the angry growlings of lions, raging against their chains and roaring at the dead of night; bristly boars, too, and caged bears voice their rage, and shapes of huge wolves fiercely howl. These the cruel goddess Circe had changed by magic herbs from the mien of men to beasts in looks and form. But that the faithful Trojans might not be borne into her harbors and undergo such hideous change, nor yet approach those cursed shores, Neptune filled their sails with the winds they wished, and sped them on their way, bearing them past the seething shallows.

And now the sea was reddening with beams of light and down from high heaven Aurora was shining, saffron-clad in her rosy car, when of a sudden the winds are hushed, every breeze grows still and the oars labor in a sluggish sea. Then it was that Aeneas, looking forth from the level water, sees a vast forest. Through this the Tiber, a beauteous stream, with whirling eddies and all yellow with sand pours onward into the sea. Around and above birds of varied plumage, haunting the banks and stream, were soothing the air with their song, and flitting through the wood. Aeneas bids his comrades change their course and landward turn their prows, and with joyful heart enters the dark-shadowed river.

Help me now, Erăto, while I unfold who were the kings, what the condition, what the state of things in ancient Latium, when first a stranger host brought its fleet to Ausonia's shores, and while I recall the beginning of the first fight. Prompt thou, thou goddess, thy bard. I shall tell of dreadful wars, I shall tell of armies ranged for battle, of kings driven by passion to deadly strife, of the Tyrrhenian force, and all Hesperia mustered under arms. A greater series of events rises to my view; a greater task I undertake.

King Latinus, now far on in years, was ruling country and cities with tranquil sway in long-continued peace. He, so tradition tells, was born of Faunus and a Laurentian nymph, Marica. Faunus' father was Picus, and he claims thee, Saturnus, as his sire; thou wert the remotest founder of the race. A son and male issue by heaven's decree he had no longer ; for the one just rising to man's estate was snatched away in the bloom of youth. The sole maintainer of the house, sole heir of so great a realm, was a daughter, now grown to age for wedlock, of years enough to be a bride. Many from great Latium, aye from all Ausonia, sought her hand. One suitor wooes her, before all others the most beautiful, Turnus, mighty in the fame of sires and grandsires. His union with her daughter the queen was pushing on with wondrous zeal; but portents from the gods bar the way with various terrors. There was a laurel within the palace, in the lofty inner court, of sacred foliage, and kept with reverence through many years. This tree, chanced upon by father Latinus, when first he began to found a citadel, 't was said that he himself had consecrated to Phoebus, and from this had given his people the name Laurentes. This tree's very top, thick-swarming bees beset, wondrous to tell, sailing athwart the clear air with loud humming, and, intertwining their feet, hung down in a moment like a cluster from a leafy bough. At once a prophet spoke: "I see," he said, "a hero coming from afar, and a host moving this same way from the same quarter, and holding sway in the highest citadel." Then, too, as the maiden Lavinia, standing by her father's side, was lighting up the altars with hallowed torches, she seemed, oh, dreadful sight! to take fire in her long tresses, and all that decked her to burn in crackling flame, her queenly hair ablaze, ablaze her crown sparkling with gems. Then they saw her wrapped in smoking, lurid glare, and scattering fire through all the palace. This as a portent full of dread, and wonderful to behold, was spread abroad. For men foretold that she would be illustrious in fame and fortune herself, but that to her people she foreboded awful war. But the king, wholly roused by these portents, resorts to the oracle of Faunus, his prophetic sire, and seeks counsel of the groves beneath high Albunea, Albunea mightiest of woods, ever echoing with sacred stream and pouring forth a deadly vapor from its dark depths. From here the Italian tribes and all the Oenotrian land seek answers in time of doubt. When to this place the priest has brought his offerings and has laid himself down in the silent night on the outspread skins of slaughtered sheep, and courted slumber, he sees many phantoms flitting about in wondrous ways, and hears various voices; and enjoys converse with the gods, and addresses the powers of hell in deep Avernus. Here also then father Latinus, seeking answer by himself, had slaughtered duly a hundred thick-wooled sheep, and lay resting on their hides and outspread fleeces, when, of a sudden, from out the high grove a voice was heard: "Seek not, my son, to unite thy daughter in wedlock with a Latin; trust not the marriage made ready. From afar shall come a son-in-law to raise our name through his descendants to the stars; from that stock, too, his offspring shall see all things to where the sun in its revolving course beholds either Ocean, brought under their feet and made subject to their sway." This answer of his father Faunus, this warning given in the silence of the night, Latinus did not keep within the barrier of his own lips. Nay, Rumor flying far and wide had already spread it through the cities of Ausonia, what time the warrior youth sprung from Laomedon moored their fleet to the shore's grassy bank.

Aeneas and his chief captains and fair Iulus stretched their limbs under the boughs of a tall tree, they make ready a feast, and along the sward place wheaten cakes under their food — such was the prompting of great Jove — and on these trenchers of Ceres they pile wild fruits. Then, when, all else devoured, it chanced that their scant fare forced them to turn their teeth upon the thin wheaten platters and to profane with reckless hand and mouth the circle of the fateful cakes, and not to spare their broad squares, Iulus cries, "Ho, we are eating our tables too," and added no more to his jest. This was the word they heard that brought at length an end of toils; at once his father caught it up from the lips of the boy, ere his speech was ended, and checked him, awe-struck at the sacred sign. Then he cried, "Hail, land destined by fate to be mine, and you, O faithful gods of Troy, all hail! Here is our home, this is our country! My father Anchises, now I remember, left me these mystic words of fate: 'When, my son, you shall be wafted to unknown shores and shall be compelled, your food consumed, to eat your very tables, then, when spent with toil, hope for a home, and remember there to build with your own hand your first dwellings, and raise a rampart round them.' This was that hunger, this was the last strait in store for us, destined to put a limit to our woes. Come then, and at the first light of the sun with glad hearts let us find out what land this is, what race of men possess it, where their city; and from the haven make we our search by different ways. Now pour libations to Jove, with prayers invoke Anchises, my father, and once more place the wine-cups on the tables." When he had spoken thus, he wreathes his brows with a leafy spray, and prays to the Genius of the place, and to Earth, first of the gods, and to the nymphs and to the rivers yet unknown; then he invokes Night and the rising stars of night, Idaean Jove, and the Phrygian mother, each in turn, and his two parents, one in heaven, one in the shades below. At once the omnipotent father thundered loudly thrice from the high heaven, and displayed in upper air, shaking with his own hand, a cloud flashing with rays of golden light. Then of a sudden a rumor spread through the Trojan ranks that the day had come on which they are to found their destined city. Eagerly they renew the banquet and joyful at the great omen they set on the mixing-bowls and wreathe the wine-cups.

When on the morrow the rising day began to traverse the earth with early torch, turning different ways they search for the city and explore the country and the shores of the people. These they find to be the waters of the Numician spring, this the Tiber stream; here the brave Latins dwell. Then the son of Anchises commands an embassy of a hundred, chosen from the whole body, to go to the stately city of the monarch, all bearing boughs from Pallas' tree, to carry presents to the hero, and ask friendship for the Trojans. There is no delay. Those who are summoned make haste and move with rapid steps. Aeneas marks out a city with a shallow trench, and toils himself at the place. His first dwellings on the shore he surrounds like a camp with battlements and rampart. And now the band of youthful heroes, their journey well-nigh ended, caught sight of the towers and lofty roofs of the Latins, and approached the walls. Before the city, boys and youths in their first bloom are busied with horses, and with breaking in their chariot teams amid the dust, or bend their springing bows, or hurl with strength of arm their limber spears, and vie in running and in boxing. Meanwhile one gallops forward with a message and brings to the ears of the aged king the news that men of mighty stature and in strange garb have come. The king bids summon them within the palace and takes his seat there in the midst on his ancestral throne. The palace, Laurentine Picus' regal seat, noble, spacious, with a hundred lofty columns, stood on the city's height, with gloom of woods about it, all solemn with ancestral veneration. Here to receive the sceptre and to first raise the fasces was for kings a happy presage. This was their senate-house and temple; this the place for sacred banquets. Here after the sacrifice of a ram the fathers were wont to sit, adown long lines of tables. Then, too, images in succession of old ancestors in ancient cedar, Italus, and father Sabinus, planter of the vine, bearing as a statue a curved knife for pruning, and hoary Saturn and the form of two-faced Janus stood in the entrance hall; other kings besides from earliest times, and those who suffered wounds in battle, fighting for their country. Many arms, also, hang on the sacred door-posts, chariots taken in war, curved battle-axes, and helmet-crests, and ponderous bars of gates, javelins and shields, and beaks torn from ships. There with Quirinal staff and girded with short robe, holding in his left hand the sacred shield, sat Picus' own self — Picus, tamer of horses. Him Circe, blind with the jealous passion of a lover, striking with a golden wand, transformed with magic drugs and made a bird and sprinkled colors on his wings. Such was the temple of the gods, wherein, on the throne of his fathers, sat Latinus and summoned the Trojans into the hall and to his presence. Then when they had entered, he thus began with gentle words:

"Say, sons of Dardanus, for not unknown to us is your city and your race, but heralded by fame have you bent hitherward your course over the sea. What ask ye? What cause or what need has brought your barks to the Ausonian shore over so many dark blue seas? Whether from mistaking the way or driven by storms — for many such mischances befall mariners on the deep — you have entered within the banks of our river, and anchored in our haven, shun not our welcome, and be not ignorant of the Latins, the race of Saturn, that keeps itself just without bond of law, of its own will, and according to the rule of its ancient god. And indeed I do remember — the tradition is somewhat dimmed by time — that the Aruncan fathers used to tell how Dardanus sprung from this land and made his way to the Idaean cities of Phrygia and Thracian Samos, which now is called Samothracia. From here, from the Tuscan seat of Corythus, he set forth, and now the golden palace of starry heaven receives him to a throne, and adds another to the altars of the gods."

He ended, and Ilioneus followed with these words: "King, illustrious son of Faunus, neither wave-tossed by a dark storm have we been driven to approach your land, nor deceived in the direction of our way by star or shore: of set purpose and with hearts that willed it we come every one to your city, driven from realms once the mightiest which the sun saw in his course from heaven's remotest bounds. From Jove is the origin of our race. In Jove as their founder the children of Dardanus rejoice. Our king himself, Trojan Aeneas, sprung from Jove's exalted blood, has sent us to your threshold. How great a storm pouring from cruel Mycenae swept through the Idaean plains, and by what destinies the two worlds of Europe and Asia were driven to meet in the shock of war, even he has heard whom in the remotest land the encircling ocean cuts off, and he who is kept far asunder by the zone of the torrid sun, spread wide between four other zones. From out that deluge, borne over so many a waste of waters, we ask for our country's gods a narrow resting-place, and a strip of shore safe from harm, and water and air, that are free to all. No disgrace shall we be to your kingdom, nor will the increase of your fame be slight, nor shall gratitude for so great a favor fade with time, nor yet Ausonia mourn that she received Troy to her bosom. I swear by Aeneas' star and by his strong right hand, if any one hath proved it in compact of peace or in war and arms, many a people, many a nation — scorn us not because we come even with fillets in our hands and words of supplication — have sought our alliance, and wished to join us to themselves. But heavenly oracles impelled us by their stern commands to seek out your lands. From here Dardanus sprung. To this place Apollo recalls us, and that by urgent high commands, to Tuscan Tiber, and the sacred waters of Numicius' spring. Aeneas offers thee besides some trifling presents from his former wealth, relics snatched from burning Troy. From this golden bowl father Anchises used to pour out libations at the altars. This was once borne by Priam when he summoned his people, as was his wont, and gave them laws, — this sceptre; this his sacred diadem, these his robes, the handiwork of Trojan dames."

While thus Ilioneus speaks, Latinus keeps his face bent down in steadfast gaze, and remains unmoved where he sits, rolling his eyes in earnest meditation. But neither the broidered purple robe nor the sceptre of Priam so much moves the king as does dwelling on the marriage of his daughter and nuptial rights, while he turns over in his mind the oracle of ancient Faunus. 'This, then, was that son-in-law coming from a foreign land, as prophesied by the fates, one called to rule with equal sway. To him there should be a progeny preëminent in valor and destined to master the whole world.' At length he joyfully speaks: "May the gods attend with favor our beginning and their own prediction! That shall be granted, Trojan, which you desire, nor do I scorn your gifts. You shall not lack, while Latinus is king, the bounty of a fruitful land, nor yet the wealth of Troy. Only let Aeneas, if his yearning for us is so great, if he is eager for the bond of friendship and to be called our ally, come to us himself. Let him not shrink from the face of a friend. A beginning of our league it shall be to me to have touched the hand of your king. Do you now take back to your prince in reply this my message: I have a daughter, whose union with a husband of our own race neither oracles from my father's shrine nor the many portents from heaven permit. That a son-in-law will come from foreign shores, that such is Latium's destiny, so they foretell; one who, by his issue, shall raise our name to the stars. That this is that man whom destiny demands, I both believe and, if my mind presages aught of truth, I so desire." Such words speaks the aged king and chooses horses from out his whole stud. They stood, three hundred, sleek of coat in lofty stalls. At once he ordered a wing-footed steed, caparisoned with broidered purple housings to be led out for each of the Trojans in succession. Golden poitrels hang down upon their breasts. They are covered with gold, of yellow gold the bits they champ under their teeth. For the absent Aeneas a chariot and pair of divine seed, breathing fire from their nostrils, of that stock which cunning Circe bred without the knowledge of her father, a bastard breed from a substituted dam. with his message the followers of Aeneas return mounted and with high hearts bringing back a message of peace.

But lo! returning from Inachian Argos there was the cruel wife of Jove, even now holding on her way lightly through the air. From the distant sky, even from above Sicilian Pachynus, she discerns glad-hearted Aeneas and the Dardan fleet. She sees how he is already rearing roofs, is already trusting to the land, having parted from his ships. Pierced with keen anguish she paused, then shaking her head, poured forth these words from her breast: "Ah, hated race! ah, fates opposed to mine — fates of the Phrygians! Can it then be that they fell on the Sigean plains? that the captured were captured? Did then Troy in burning burn, too, her men? Through the midst of battle-lines, through the midst of flames they have found a way. No doubt my power as goddess lies spent at last, or glutted with hate, I rest a while! Say rather I have deigned as a foe to hunt these men, driven from their country over seas, and to meet them exiled face to face everywhere on the deep. The powers of sky and sea have been spent against the Trojans. What have the Syrtes or Scylla, what has yawning Charybdis done for me? The Trojans are anchored in Tiber's channel, the haven they wished, safe from the sea and from me. Mars had power to destroy the giant race of the Lapithae. The father of the gods himself gave up ancient Calydon to the vengeance of Diana. For what crime deserved the Lapithae or Calydon such vengeance? But I, Jove's great consort, who have stooped without success to dare all, who have turned to every shift, am overcome by Aeneas! But if, goddess as I am, I have not might enough, let me not shrink from calling to my aid whatever power existeth anywhere. If I cannot bend the gods above, I will wake the powers of hell. It will not be vouchsafed to me to keep him from the throne of Latium — so be it — and Lavinia is destined unalterably to be his bride; still may one retard events so great, and add delays. Still may one cut off the subjects of both kings; at this price, at cost of their own peoples, let son-in-law and father make their league. Blood of Trojan and Rutulian shall be thy dower, lady, and Bellona waits to be thy bridesmaid; nor was Hecuba the only mother to teem with fire-brand and bring forth nuptial flames. Nay, Venus hath such another offspring for her own, another Paris, and again are there baleful marriage-torches for the Troy that is to be."

When she had uttered these words, in wild wrath she plunged down to earth and called woe-causing Alecto from the home of the awful goddesses and the darkness of the world below — Alecto, to whose heart mournful wars, and bursts of wrath, and plots, and guilty deeds are a delight. Hateful is she even to her father, Pluto, hateful to her Tartarean sisters, a monster and a fiend; so many the shapes she changes into, so dreadful their looks, so many the dark snakes she sprouts withal. Her Juno whets to fury, speaking words like these: "Grant me this, a service all thine own, daughter of Night; this trouble take, that my majesty may suffer no infringement, my fame lose no ground, and that the followers of Aeneas may not have power to win over Latinus through marriage-compact, or beset the Italian borders. Brothers one in soul thou canst arm for strife, and homes embroil in hate; thou canst bring the scourge on households and light the funeral torch. At once Alecto, steeped in Gorgon poison, turns first to Latium and the lofty palace of the Laurentine king, and crouches at the silent threshold of Amata, whom all a woman's cares and spite about the coming of the Trojans and the marriage with Turnus was heating to a glow. At her the goddess hurls a snake from her dark locks and buries it within her bosom's fold, close to the very heart, so that frenzied by this pest she may spread confusion through the whole house. The reptile gliding between her robe and her fair breast, coils about unfelt, and maddens unperceived, breathing into her its poisonous breath. The hideous snake becomes a golden necklace, becomes the festoon of her long fillet; it twines in and out her hair and winds its smooth way over her limbs. And while the infection, penetrating with moist venom, begins to steal over her senses and thrills her bones with fire, ere yet her spirit has quite felt the flame through her whole bosom, she speaks more gently, and as mothers are wont, shedding many tears about her daughter and the Phrygian marriage. "To exiles from Troy shall Lavinia be given in wedlock, father? Have you no pity for your daughter and yourself? No pity for the mother, whom with the first fair wind that pirate will leave, all faithless, and make for the deep with his stolen bride? But was it not even so that the Phrygian shepherd won his way to Lacedaemon, and bore off Helen, daughter of Leda, to Trojan cities? What of your solemn pledge? What of your care of old for your own? And that right hand given so many times to your kinsman Turnus? If a son-in-law must be sought for the Latins from a foreign race, and that is fixed, and the commands of your father Faunus constrain you, I, for my part, hold every land foreign that is free from our rule and lies apart, and so, I think, the gods intend. Nay, Turnus, if his lineage be traced back to the beginning, has Inachus and Acrisius as forefathers and central Mycenae for his home."

But when Amata, trying these words in vain, sees Latinus stand opposed, and when the serpent's maddening venom had sunk deep into her vitals and was thrilling through her whole frame, then truly, most unhappy and crazed by awful fancies, with unexampled fury she wildly raves through the city's whole extent. Just as sometimes under the whirling whip flies a top, which boys, in a great ring and all intent upon their sport, lash through vacant courts round and round. Round and round it spins driven by the thong. The beardless band bends over it in ignorant wonder, amazed to see how the box-wood top can fly. The blows give it quicker motion. With course no less swift than that, through the heart of cities she rushes, through fierce peoples. Nay more, feigning Bacchic frenzy, essaying greater wrong, and entering on a wilder craze, she flies forth into the woods and hides her daughter among the leafy hills, that she may snatch her from the marriage bed of the Trojans and delay the nuptial torch, crying, "Evoe, Bacchus!" with shouts proclaiming thee alone worthy of the maiden, because for thee she takes soft-wreathéd wands, thee she circles round in the dance, for thee she lets loose her sacred hair. Rumor flies abroad; frenzy kindles the hearts of mothers. At once the same passion drives all to seek new dwellings. They have left their homes; they bare their necks and tresses to the winds. But some fill the air with quivering cries, clad in skins, and bearing vine-wreathed spears. In their midst Amata herself all glowing holds aloft a burning pine-torch, chanting the bridal song of Turnus and her daughter, rolling blood-shot eyes, and of a sudden cries with savage voice: "Ho, mothers of Latium, hear me all, where'er ye be, if any love in kind hearts remains for poor Amata. If haunting care for a mother's rights stirs your souls, loose the fillets of your hair, take up with me the rites of Bacchus." So frenzied does Alecto drive the queen this way and that among the woods, among the lonely haunts of wild beasts with goads of Bacchus.

When the Fury deemed she had whetted enough the queen's first frenzies and had overturned the plan and all the house of Latinus, forthwith the awful goddess, rising on dusky wings, speeds thence to the walls of the bold Rutulian, to the city founded, it is said, by Danae for Argive settlers, borne hither from her course by the swift south wind. The place was once called Ardea by men of old; even now it keeps the great name Ardea, but its prosperity is no more. Here, Turnus, in his high-roofed palace, was now plucking deep repose from the dark night. Alecto puts off her hideous looks and form of a fury; she transforms herself to an old woman in features and furrows her ugly brow with wrinkles; she puts on white hair together with a fillet, and twines it round with spray of olive; she becomes Calybe, the aged priestess of Juno's temple, and before the eyes of the young warrior presents herself with these words: "Turnus, wilt thou let so many toils be spent in vain and thy sceptre be transferred to Dardan settlers? The king refuses thee thy bride and the dowry earned with thy blood, and an heir from afar is sought for the throne. Go now, thou scorn of men, face thankless dangers. Go, mow down the Tuscan lines, shield the Latins with peace. Just this the daughter of Saturn who hath all power bade me with her own lips say to thee face to face, while thou shouldst be slumbering in the tranquil night. Come then and joyfully get thy soldiers ready to arm and march forth from the gates to war; and as for the Phrygians, who have cast anchor in the fair stream, burn thou the leaders and their painted barks. Heaven's mighty power commands it. Let King Latinus himself, unless he consents to give thee thy bride and obey our behest, beware, and at last find out what Turnus is as a foe."

Thereat the hero, deriding the prophetess, thus in turn makes answer: "That a fleet has been borne into Tiber's stream, is not, as thou thinkest, news that has escaped my ears. Conjure me not such mighty terrors. Queenly Juno is not unmindful of me. But thee, mother, old age o'ercome by sloth and no longer capable of truth, plagues with cares in vain, and mocks thee, prophet though thou art, with groundless fear, amid the arms of kings. Let thy care be to watch over the statues and temples of the gods; wars and peace shall be the work of men, by whom wars must be waged."

Such the words at which Alecto blazed forth into wrath. But the youth, even while speaking, a sudden trembling seizes in the limbs. His eyes grow fixed, so many snakes does the fury hiss withal, so hideous the face that shows itself. Then rolling her flaming eyes, as he faltered and sought for further words, she thrust him back, and from her locks raised up two snakes, and made her lash resound and added these words with foaming lips: "Lo, it is I, o'ercome by sloth, whom old age no longer capable of truth, mocks with groundless fear amid the arms of kings. Behold again these signs. I am come from the home of the dread sisters; wars I wield in my hand, and death." As thus she spoke, she hurled a brand at the hero and planted it, smoking with lurid flames, underneath his breast. A mighty shock breaks the bonds of slumber; his body and limbs are bathed with sweat which bursts forth from his whole body. "Arms!" he madly cries; for arms he searches couch and palace. Passion for the sword rages and the accursed craze for war, and wrath to crown all. As when with loud crackling a fire of twigs under the ribs of a seething caldron mounts high and the heat makes the waters dance; within, the steaming flood is all a whirl and bubbles high in foam, till the wave contains itself no longer, but flies off in black vapor, commingling with the air; so then Turnus breaking the peace proclaims to the captains of his band a march against King Latinus and gives command to make ready arms, to protect Italy, and thrust forth the foe from the land, declaring himself a match both for the Trojans and the Latins. When he had uttered such words and called upon the gods to witness his vows, with eager zeal the Rutulians rouse one another to war. This one Turnus' peerless grace of form and youth kindles; this one his kingly ancestry; this one the glorious deeds of his right arm.

While Turnus fills the Rutulians with hearts of daring, Alecto on Stygian pinions wings her swift way against the Trojans and with new wiles views the place where, on the shore, fair Iulus was hunting the game with snares and chase. Here the infernal maiden flings on his hounds a sudden lure, and touches their nostrils with a well-known scent, to make them chase a stag in full cry: this was the first cause of woes, kindling the hearts of rustics to war.

There was a stag of surpassing beauty, with towering horns, which the sons of Tyrrhus had snatched from its dam and used to tend, they and their father Tyrrhus, who kept the royal herds, and had all the wide plain committed to his charge. The wild creature, trained to obey, Silvia, their sister, used to deck with all care, twining its antlers with soft festoons ; to comb it, too, and wash it in a clear stream. The stag, patient of the hand and accustomed to the table of its master, would graze at large in the woods and return home of itself, to the well-known door, however late at night. As once it was wandering far, the maddened hounds of the huntsman Iulus started it, while it chanced, now to be floating down a stream, now cooling its heat on the green bank. Also Ascanius himself, burning with desire for uncommon praise, bent his bow and aimed his shaft, nor was a god's presence wanting to his erring hand ; with a loud whiz the reed flies, driven through belly and through flank. But the wounded creature fled to its familiar shelter, reached its fold moaning, and covered with blood and like one pleading, filled the whole house with its wail.

The sister Silvia is the first to call for help, smiting her arms with open hands, and gathers the hardy rustics by her cries. They, for the fell fiend lurks in the silent woods, are speedily at hand, armed, this one with a stake burned at the end, this one with heavy knotted club ; whatever each one finds, as he searches round, wrath makes his weapon. Tyrrhus, as by chance he was cleaving in four a log of oak, driving home the wedges, calls his bands to the fray and snatches up his axe panting with wild rage. But the baleful goddess, from her look-out discovering the moment for mischief, wings her way to the steep roof of a hut and from the highest peak sounds the shepherds' signal, straining forth on crooked horn a hellish blast, whereat at once all the wood trembled and the forests echoed to their inmost depths. The lake of Trivia heard it far away, the river Nar, white with sulphurous stream heard it, and the waters of Velinus, and terror-stricken mothers pressed their children to their breasts.

Then indeed in answer to the call in haste they snatch up arms and rush from all around to where the dread bugle gave alarm, those untamed rustics. Likewise the Trojan warriors, too, pour forth aid for Ascanius from the open camp. Their lines are formed; no longer in a rustic contest is the battle waged with heavy clubs and charred stakes, but with two-edged steel they fight, and all around, the dark corn-land bristles with drawn swords and their bronze arms gleam, smitten by the sun, flinging light upon the clouds; as when, at the rising of the wind, the waves begin to whiten, little by little the sea lifts itself and heaves its billows higher, then mounts from its very bottom to the sky.

Then a young warrior, the eldest born of Tyrrhus' sons, Almo, is laid low in the first rank by a whizzing shaft. For it pierced his throat and sticking in the wound, choked the course of the liquid voice with blood and stopped the slender life. Here and there lie many fallen heroes; old Galaesus, too, falls as he throws himself between the hosts to plead for peace — Galaesus, the one most just and then richest in Ausonian lands. Five flocks of bleating sheep, all his, five herds used to come back from pasture; his land he turned with a hundred ploughs.

While thus the fight goes on in the plains with Mars impartial, the fiend, her promise now fulfilled, when she had begun the war with blood, and brought on the slaughter of the first battle shock, leaves Hesperia, and, turning her course through the air of heaven, victorious, addresses Juno with proud words: "Lo, at thy behest strife is complete through deadly war. Say the word, let them come together in friendship and unite in truce. Since I have sprinkled the Trojans with Ausonian blood, this favor also I will add thereto, if I am sure of thy consent. Neighboring cities I will bring into the war through rumors, and I will kindle hearts with mad passion for strife, so that they shall come from every side to help. I will strow arms over the fields." Then Juno in reply: "Of panic and deceit there is enough; causes of war stand fixed; the fight goes on amain; such arms as chance first gave, fresh blood hath dyed. Let such be the marriage and such the nuptial rites they celebrate, the noble son of Venus and king Latinus himself. That thou shouldst roam here in upper air more at will, yon father would not grant, ruler of high Olympus. Begone from here; whatever fortune in the struggle comes, I will myself direct." So spake the child of Saturn; but Alecto lifts her wings hissing with serpents and seeks by Cocytus her dwelling-place, leaving the world above.

There is a place in the heart of Italy, at the foot of lofty mountains, notable and famed in many lands, the valley of Amsanctus; this a wooded slope, dark with thick foliage confines on either side, and in its midst a broken torrent goes roaring over rocks with whirling eddies. Here an awful cavern, breathing vent of cruel Dis, men show, and a mighty chasm from the bursting up of Acheron opes its pestilential jaws ; within these vanished the fury, a fiend abhorred, and brought relief to earth and sky.

But none the less meanwhile does Saturnia, the queen, put the last stroke to her plan of war. The whole body of shepherds rush from the battle-field to the city and bring back the slain, the boy Almo and Galaesus, his face all ghastly with wounds, and invoke the gods and adjure Latinus. Turnus is there and amid the fiery outcry at the slaughter redoubles the alarm; that the Trojans are summoned into the kingdom ; that the Phrygian race is to be mingled with the Latin ; that he himself is banished from the palace. Then they whose women with Bacchic frenzy foot the pathless woods in wild dances (for no light thing is Amata's name) muster from everywhere and tire Latinus with cries of "War !" "War !" At once and with one voice they demand unhallowed war, against the omens, against the fates of the gods, prompted by some deity malign. In struggling crowds they swarm about the palace of King Latinus. He like a rock in the sea, stands unmoved ; like a rock in the sea which keeps its place by its mass, despite the loud, on-coming crash of waters, amid the countless waves that bark about ; vainly roar the peaks and foaming crags around ; in vain is the sea-weed dashed against its side and swept away.

But when no power is given to overcome their blind purpose and things move on at cruel Juno's beck, the father, many times calling the gods to witness, and the idle air, cries out, "Alas, we are crushed by the fates, we are swept away by the storm ! You yourselves shall pay the penalty for this with your impious blood, O, hapless men ! Thee, Turnus, man of guilt, dire vengeance shall await, and too late shalt thou pray to the gods. As for me, rest is secured; I am close to my haven's verge. Only of a happy end am I deprived." Then, saying no more, he shut himself up in the palace and let go the reins of power.

There was a custom in ancient Latium, a sacred rite, which the Alban cities kept up unbroken, still observed by Rome, mistress of the world, when first they rouse Mars to battle, getting ready to wage woful war with valor on the Getae, or Hyrcanians, or Arabians, or to march against the Indians, to follow the dawn, and wrest back standards from the Parthians.

There are twin gates of war—so they name them—held sacred through awe and dread of savage Mars, closed by a hundred brazen bolts and the everlasting strength of iron. The guardian Janus never quits the threshold. These gates, when once the purpose of the fathers is firmly fixed on war, these creaking portals, the consul himself opens, conspicuous by his Quirinal robe and girded as the Gabines were; with his own voice he invokes war; then the rest of the warriors take up the cry, and horns of brass sound forth in harsh accord. Then, too, obedient to this rite, they bade Latinus declare war against the followers of Aeneas, and open the dreadful gates. The father would not touch them, but turning away shrank from the loathsome office and hid himself in the deep gloom of the palace. Then Saturnia, queen of the gods, darting down from the sky, smote the lingering portals with her own hand and burst wide on turning hinge the iron barred gates of war. Ausonia, unroused and all inert before, is aflame. A part make ready to march on foot over the plains; a part career about mounted on high steeds amid clouds of dust; all demand arms; a part rub smooth their shields and brighten up their darts with rich fat, and press down their axes on the grindstone. 'Tis their delight to bear standards and hear the blare of trumpets. Five great cities, and no less, set up anvils and forge weapons anew, powerful Atina, proud Tibur, Ardea, Crustumeri, and Antemnae with her crown of towers. They hollow out safe coverings for the head and weave wicker shields of osier twigs; others beat out breast-plates of bronze or polished greaves of ductile silver; to this has the share's, the sickle's pride, to this all love for the plough given place; once more they forge in furnaces the swords of their fathers. Now the war trumps sound; now passes the watch-word, sign for war. This one with eager haste snatches a helmet from his roof-tree; that one forces to the yoke his snorting steeds; shield and golden three-plied corslet he dons and to his side girds his trusty sword.

Open now Helicon, ye Muses, and inspire my song! Tell what kings were roused to war, what hosts filled the plains and whom they followed; of what heroes even then Italy boasted, land of bounty; with what arms she was ablaze. For ye remember, Muses, and have power to tell; to us scarce comes a faint breath of tradition.

First to enter the war and first to arm his bands is Mezentius from Tuscan shores, fierce scorner of the gods. By his side marched Lausus, his son, than whom no second was more comely, save only fair Turnus of Laurentum. Lausus, tamer of horses and subduer of wild beasts, leads from the city of Agylla in vain a thousand followers, Lausus worthy to have been happier in the sovereignty of a father, and worthy to have had another sire than Mezentius.

crowned chariot and his victorious steeds, comes the seed of handsome Hercules, handsome Aventinus, and on his shield he bears the emblem of his father, the Hydra, girt with a hundred snakes. Him in a grove of the Aventine hill, the priestess Rhea bore in secret and brought forth to the realms of light, a woman uniting with a god, after the hero of Tiryns, slayer of Geryon, came as victor to the fields of Laurentum and bathed his Iberian cows in the Tuscan stream. Javelins in their hands and cruel pikes his men bear to the war, and fight with tapering sword and Sabellian spear. He himself on foot, flinging round him a huge lion's skin with shaggy, awful mane, the white teeth encircling his head, thus entered the royal palace, fierce of aspect, his shoulders robed like those of Hercules.

Then two brothers leave the walls of Tibur — city and people called from the name of their brother Tiburtus — Catillus and bold Coras, youths of Argos, and in the front ranks storm along mid showers of darts; as when from a high mountain top come down two cloud-born Centaurs, leaving Homole and snow-covered Othrys in their swift career, the mighty woods part at their approach and bushes fall with a loud crash.

Nor did the founder of Praeneste's town fail to come, born to Vulcan mid flocks of the field, a prince, and found at the hearth, so every age hath believed, Caeculus his name. Him attends a band of peasants loosely ordered[1], the men who dwell in high Praeneste and the lands of Gabii, sacred to Juno, and by cold Anio's banks, and on the Hernic cliffs, bedewed by streams. These thou dost feed, rich Anagnia, and thy stream, too, father Amasenus.

Not all of them have ringing arms nor shields nor chariots; bullets of grey lead the most part fling; a part wield two javelins in their hands, and have tawny caps of wolf-skin for covering the head; the sole of the left foot is bare, as they march; a boot of untanned hide covers the other.

But Messapus, tamer of horses, son of Neptune, whom fate permits no one to lay low by fire or steel, without delay calls to arms clans now long inactive and hosts unused to war, and once more grasps the sword. These leaders have Fescennian troops and the Aequian Falisci. These bands inhabit the heights of Soracte, and the Flavinian lands, Mount Ciminus, its lakeside, too, and groves of Capena. They marched with measured tread and sang the praises of their king; as sing at times the snow-white swans amid the bright clouds, when they come back from feeding and pour from their long throats melodious notes; the river and the Asian mead far around re-echo with the song. No one would think the bronze-clad lines of so great a host were gathering for war, but rather that a cloud of harsh-voiced birds were pressing onward from the deep sea, through the air to land.

Nursia sent, and the Ortinian troops, and the Latin tribes; those whom the Allia, ill-starred name, divides and flows between, as many as the billows that roll along the Lybian sea, when stormy Orion hides his face in the wintry waves, or as the thick-standing heads of grain, when they are parched by the summer sun in the plain of Hermus or in the golden fields of Lycia. Shields ring and Earth is startled with the tramp of feet.

Next Halaesus, friend of Agamemnon, and foe of the Trojan name, yokes his horses to his car, and to aid Turnus hurries on a thousand fierce clans: those who till the vine-clad Massic heights, and those whom the Auruncan fathers sent from the high hills; and the dwellers in the Sidicinian plains hard by; those, too, who leave Cales or dwell by the bank of Vulturnus' shallow stream, alike the rough Saticulan and the bands of the Osci. Smooth darts are their weapons, but these it is their custom to fit with pliant thong; a target covers their left hand; scythe-shaped their swords for close encounter.

Nor shalt thou be left unsung by lays of mine, Oebalus, born, 'tis said, to Telon by a naiad of the Sebethus, while he held sway o'er Capreae, the realm of the Teleboans, when now advanced in years; but the son, not likewise content with the dominion of his father, was even then curbing under his sway the wide-spread Sarrastes, and ruling the plains which the Sarnus waters, with the people who hold Rufrae and Batulum and the lands of Celemna, and those whom the city of apple-bearing Abella sees beneath her, all wont to hurl the boomerang in the Teuton way; the covering of their heads was bark stripped from the cork-tree; of bronze their gleaming bucklers, of bronze the gleaming sword.

to war, illustrious by thy fame and victorious arms, thy race rough above others and inured to constant hunting in the woods — the Aequian race of stubborn soil. Armed they till the soil and ever it is their delight to gather fresh spoil and live by plunder. Nor are these all. From the Marrubian race comes a priest, his helmet-top decked with leaves of the fruitful olive, sent by King Archippus, Umbro, bravest of the brave, who on the serpent race and hydras, breathing venom, was wont to shed sleep by charm of song and hand, and soothed their wrath, and by his art healed their sting. But no power had he to heal the thrust of Dardan lance, nor of help to him for wounds were incantations that bring sleep, nor herbs sought on Marsic hills. Thee the grove of Angitia, thee Fucinus of crystal wave, thee the limpid lakes bewailed.

There marched, too, the child of Hippolytus, glorious in war, Virbius of noble fame, whom his mother Aricia sent, reared in Egeria's groves, round about the damp shore where stands Diana's shrine, rich and kindly goddess. For tradition tells how Hippolytus, when by his step-dame's craft he had perished and had paid with his blood the penalty due a father,[1] dragged to death by frightened steeds, came back again to the realms of life and the air of this upper world, raised from the dead by Paeonian herbs and Diana's love. Then the father omnipotent, incensed that any mortal should rise from the shades below to the light of life, with his own hand hurled down by his thunderbolt the son of Phoebus, inventor of such cure and art, to the waters of the Styx. But kind Trivia hides Hippolytus in her own haunts and commits him to the nymph Egeria and her grove, that there alone, in Italian woods, unknown to fame he may pass his life and with changed name be Virbius.[1] Whence still from Trivia's temple and the sacred grove horn-hoofed horses are kept away; because, scared by monsters from the sea, they dashed to ruin chariot and hero on the shore. Yet none the less guided the son his fiery steeds along the level of the plain and in his chariot rushed to war.

Turnus himself, of beauteous form moves with arms in hand among the foremost and overtops them by a whole head. His towering helmet with three-fold crest of hair bears a Chimaera breathing forth fires of Aetna from her jaws, raging and wild with baleful flames so much the more, the more fiercely waxes the ensanguined fight. But his smooth shield bore for emblem an Io with uplifted horns in gold, now a heifer, clothed with hair, a wondrous device; and Argus, watcher of the maid, and father Inachus pouring out a river from a chased urn. Him follows a cloud of marching men, and hosts armed with shields crowd all the plains, Argive braves, Aruncan bands, Rutuli and Sicanians of ancient stock, Sacranian ranks and Labīci with painted shields: they who plough thy glades, Tiber, and the sacred shore of Numicius, and vex with the share the Rutulian hills and Circe's height; and the land over which Jupiter Anxurus watches, and Feronia delighting in her green grove, where lies the gloomy lake of Satura, and where the cold Ufens seeks a way through the lowest vales and buries itself in the sea.

Hos super advenit Volsca de gente Camilla, agmen agens equitum et florentis aere catervas, bellatrix, non illa colo calathisve Minervae femineas adsueta manus, sed proelia virgo dura pati cursuque pedum praevertere ventos.
illa vel intactae segetis per summa volaret gramina, nec teneras cursu laesisset aristas; vel mare per medium fluctu suspensa tumenti ferret iter, celeris nec tingueret aequore plantas.
illam omnis tectis agrisque effusa iuventus turbaque miratur matrum et prospectat euntem, attonitis inhians animis, ut regius ostro velet honos levis umeros, ut fibula crinem auro internectat, Lyciam ut gerat ipsa pharetram et pastoralem praefixa cuspide myrtum.

804 catervas, turmas. — 807 praevertere, praeterire, superare. — 811 plantas, vestigia (689). — 815 levis, pulchros, nitentes.

Besides these comes Camilla of the Volscian race, leading a band of knights and squadrons gleaming in bronze, a warrior maid, her woman's hands not wonted to the distaff and basket of Minerva, but, maid as she was, used to endure stern combats and to outstrip the winds by speed of foot. She could skim along the top of a field of grain untouched by the sickle, and leave the tender ears uncrushed by her tread ; or, over mid-sea poised on the swelling-waves, she could speed on her way, nor dip in the sea her flying feet. Her, all the youth, pouring out from home and fields, and throngs of women see with wonder, and follow with their eyes as she goes, open-mouthed, with souls awe-struck to see how the pride of royal purple veils her smooth shoulders ; how a clasp of gold confines her hair, how she bears a Lycian quiver and shepherd's pike of myrtle-wood, tipped with point of iron.

The Beginner's Latin Book.

Complete with Grammar, Exercises, Selections for Translating, and Vocabulary.

By WILLIAM C. COLLAR, A.M., Head Master Roxbury Latin School, and M. GRANT DANIELL, A.M., Principal Chauncy-Hall School, Boston. 12mo. Cloth. xii + 283 pages. Mailing price, $1.10; for introduction, $1.00.

NOW that the Beginner's Latin Book has been before the public nearly six years, the publishers are able to say without hesitation that it has been far more successful than any other introductory Latin book ever published in this country. This remarkable result is due to a combination of excellences so skilfully blended that effects are more patent than causes. While the book may be used as an introduction to Cæsar, it is more than this, — it is an introduction to Latin as a language. It prepares the student not only to begin the study of Cæsar, but, with proper guidance, to make remarkably rapid and satisfactory progress in reading and understanding Latin. The skill of the authors as teachers has enabled them to secure these larger results without deviation from the main line or increase of difficulties. The fundamental idea was to combine the utmost practice with the minimum of theory, on the principle that a thorough acquisition of the elements of Latin by the young learner must be more a process than a science, more the work of observation, comparison, and imitation than the mechanical following of rules or the exercise of analysis and conscious inductive reasoning. There are therefore abundant and varied exercises on the forms and more important constructions of the language. The skilful choice of words has made it possible to provide exercises that are in themselves interesting. The colloquia (simple Latin dialogues), the extracts for translation, introduced as early as possible, and the mode of treatment throughout are made to impart attractiveness, freshness, and variety, though there is no sacrifice of rigorous scientific method. Even if the time allowed for Latin the first year is quite limited, teachers may still be able to carry classes through the book by omitting certain detachable portions of the course. Provision has been made for the practical use of Latin in oral teaching.

Note the testimony of those who have used it.

Andrew F. West, Prof. of Latin, Princeton College: It is decidedly the best beginner's book with which I am acquainted.

H. A. Rennert, Instr. in Ancient Lang., University of Pennsylvania: I have never seen a book that made the beginning of Latin so interesting, nor one in which every fact of the language is so well explained.

A. C. Perkins, Prin. Adelphi Academy, Brooklyn: For the second year we are using it with increasing satisfaction. The hand of a wise and skilful teacher is manifest on every page.

M. S. Bartlett, High School, Haverhill, Mass.: I am using it with a large class, and find it altogether the most satisfactory book that I know of for beginners in the study of Latin.

John H. Peck, Prin. New Britain High School, New Britain, Conn.: I am free to say that I am perfectly satisfied with it; at least, I have never used a beginner's Latin book that I liked nearly so well.

C. T. Bonney, Jr., Teacher of Latin, High School, New Bedford, Mass.: We have used it for two years, and consider it by far the best book we have tried yet.

E. C. Adams, Prin. High School, Newburyport, Mass.: The longer I use the book, the more it pleases me.

G. W. Manley, Prof. of Latin, Wake Forest College: It impresses me as the best thing in the market for first-year students in Latin.

S. E. Thompson, Prof. of Latin, Baylor University, Texas: The enthusiasm with which our beginners have been inspired this year leads me to say that instead of being a dead language, Latin is now one of the livest languages taught in our course.

The Gate to Cæsar.

By WILLIAM C. COLLAR, A.M., Head Master of the Roxbury Latin School, Boston. With map, and head of Cæsar. Square 16mo. Cloth. xii + 141 pages. Mailing price, 45 cents; for introduction, 40 cents.

THE object of this little book is to save time and labor by distributing difficulties. The text of the second book of Cæsar's Gallic War is simplified, chiefly by omissions; but after the simplified text is given the full text, which may be studied in immediate succession, or be deferred till the learner's wings are grown. Synonymous Latin words are given at the foot of the page, explanatory notes follow the text, and on each chapter of the simplified text, a brief exercise is given for translation into Latin. The etymological vocabulary has been proved of great interest and value.

John Tetlow, Head Master Girls' High and Latin Schools, Boston: It is so necessary and so clever a piece of work that it seems a wonder it was not done long ago.

Allen & Greenough's New Cæsar.

Seven Books. Illustrated. With Six double-page colored maps.

Edited by W. F. ALLEN, late Prof. in University of Wisconsin, J. H. ALLEN, of Cambridge, and H. P. JUDSON, Professor of History, University of Minnesota, with a special Vocabulary by Prof. J. B. GREENOUGH, of Harvard College. 12mo. xxvi + 543 pages, red edges, bound in half-morocco. Mailing Price, $1.35; for introduction, $1.25.

ATTENTION is invited to these features, which, with other merits, have gained this edition an extraordinary success: —

1. The judicious notes, — their full grammatical references, crisp, idiomatic renderings, scholarly interpretations of difficult passages, clear treatment of indirect discourse, the helpful maps, diagrams, and pictures; in particular, the military notes, throwing light on the text, and giving life and reality to the narrative.

2. The vocabulary, — convenient, comprehensive, and scholarly, combining the benefits of the full lexicon with the advantages of the special vocabulary, and every way superior to the ordinary vocabulary.

3. The mechanical features of the volume, its clear type, convenient size and shape, superior paper, and attractive binding.

4. In general, this edition represents the combined work of several specialists in different departments, and so ought to excel an edition edited by any single scholar.

The Notes on the second book have just been rewritten to adapt them for those who begin Cæsar with this book. Full grammatical references have been given.

Tracy Peck, Prof. of Latin, Yale College: With quite unusual satisfaction I have noticed the beautiful paper and type; the carefully edited text; the truly helpful notes, which neither tend to deaden enthusiasm with superfluous grammar, nor blink real difficulties; the very valuable illustrations and remarks on the Roman military art; and the scholarly and stimulating vocabulary.

John Tetlow, Prin. of Girls' High and Latin Schools, Boston: The clear type, judicious annotation, copious pictorial illustration, full explanation of terms and usages belonging to the military art, and excellent vocabulary, combine to make this edition easily first among the school editions of Cæsar.

G. W. Shurtleff, Prof. of Latin, Oberlin (Ohio) College: I do not hesitate to pronounce it the best edition I have ever seen.

J. L. Lampson, Teacher of Latin, State Normal College, Nashville, Tenn.: It is the best Cæsar published.

Allen & Greenough's New Cicero.

Thirteen Orations. Illustrated.

Edited by W. F. ALLEN, late Prof. in University of Wisconsin, J. H. ALLEN, of Cambridge, and Prof. J. B. GREENOUGH, of Harvard University. With a special Vocabulary by Professor Greenough. 12mo. Half-morocco. xix + 670 pages. Mailing price, $1.40; for introduction, $1.25.

THIS edition includes thirteen orations arranged chronologically, and covering the entire public life of Cicero. The introductions connect the orations, and, with them, supply a complete historical study of this most interesting and eventful period. The Life of Cicero, List of his Writings, and Chronological Table will be found of great value. The orations are: Defence of Roscius, Impeachment of Verres (The Plunder of Syracuse and Crucifixion of a Roman Citizen), The Manilian Law, the four orations against Catiline, For Archias, For Sestius, For Milo, The Pardon of Marcellus, For Ligarius, and the Fourteenth Philippic.

The notes have been thoroughly rewritten in the light of the most recent investigations and the best experience of the classroom. Topics of special importance, as, for instance, the Antiquities, are given full treatment in brief essays or excursuses, printed in small type. References are given to the grammars of Allen & Greenough, Gildersleeve, and Harkness.

A. E. Chase, Prin. of High School, Portland, Me.: I am full better pleased with it than with the others of the series, although I thought those the best of the kind.

F. E. Rockwood, Prof. Latin, Bucknell University, Pa.: The work of editing seems to have been done with the utmost care. The result is a model text-book.

O. D. Robinson, Prin. of High School, Albany, N.Y.: I find it a worthy companion, in every way, of its two predecessors, the Virgil and the Cæsar. I can say no more than this in its praise, for I have already spoken sincerely, in almost unqualified terms, of these two books.

John L. Lampson, Prof. of Latin, State Normal College, Nashville, Tenn.: The text, in appearance and authority, is the best; the notes, ample, judicious, modern; the vocabulary is the best school-book vocabulary published.

L. B. Wharton, Prof. Latin, College of William and Mary: It is the best school edition of Cicero's Orations that I have ever seen. The vocabulary is admirable.

THE selections were chosen with a view to making the study of Latin interesting. Most of them are from the Metamorphoses, of which about one-third has been taken. By help of the argument, which is given in full, the editor has endeavored to put before the reader something like a complete picture of the Greek mythology, at least of those narratives which have held their permanent place in the modern mind and have entered more or less into every modern literature.

Professor Greenough's vocabulary, similar in style and character to his Cæsar, Cicero, and Virgil vocabularies, adds greatly to the value of the edition, and the illustrations will be found truly illustrative.

William A. Packard, Prof. of Latin, Princeton College: The abundant illustrations of mythology, now introduced, so specially appropriate and indeed necessary to the student's best appreciation of these poems, make this book peculiarly attractive and useful.

Mary S. Anthony, Teacher of Latin and Greek, Bradford Academy, Mass.: I find that it is admirably arranged for a comprehensive study of the Metamorphoses. I like, in fact, the entire Allen and Greenough series, and have introduced them into my work here in the Academy.

Jno. K. Lord, Prof. of Latin, Dartmouth College: The best school edition of the works of Virgil with which I am acquainted.

Practical Latin Composition.

By WILLIAM C. COLLAR, A.M., Head Master of the Roxbury Latin School, Boston; Author of The Beginner's Latin Book and Collar's Eysenbach. 12mo. Cloth. x + 268 pages. Mailing Price, $1.10; Introduction, $1.00.

THE book consists of two classes of exercises, all based on selections from the Latin authors usually read in schools.

The first exercise of each group contains easy sentences to be turned into Latin orally. The second consists of a short passage of continuous English to be written out in Latin, based on the same Latin text as the preceding. Notes and occasional grammatical references accompany the exercises, and a carefully prepared vocabulary is given at the end.

Charles D. Seely, Teacher of Latin, State Normal School, Brockport, N.Y.: It has been in use in my classes for more than a year, with most satisfactory results. The old method now seems so stupid that we wonder why we ever used it.
